He set outed off as a coddle then a small boy, now he's a full-grown man (yet still very boyish). Some of his fondest memories are listening to Neil Young tapes - like Harvest, Rust Never Sleeps, and Comes A Time - while driving somewhere to go sailboarding, then riggin' up or waitin' for the wind to blow. He moved to Ottawa to attend Carleton University where he graduated with a Public Administration degree after spending the greater part of his time carousing and competing in full-contact Tae Kwon Do, having earned his black-belt. Andrew worked as a computer programmer which led him to Austin to pursue both a career in software development and music. He wasn't in Austin seven months when a surfing trip to San Diego would change his life forever and have him sitting in a wheelchair. Within one year he became the Canadian National Handcycling Champion. While writing music and practicing on the guitar, it wasn't until he met Champ Covington that he would spend countless hours playing recording, creating the band White Colla (white-collar dudes, blue-collar attitudes... seemed like a revelation at the time). Andrew has just finished his first solo cd entitled Just One Souvenir and is now working on an acoustic project entitled Killin' Flies and a more upbeat record he calls Midnight Afternoon. More importantly, he is standing on his braces and stretching daily, fighting the pain, and soon to be walking - thanks to the man upstairs - after five years of never planning to again.
