After graduation, he landed a job at the London-based advertising agency, Ogilvy Mather, as a graphic designer in the Chicago creative group. Since that first gig, Tim has continued to be a "creative" through his writing, acting and drawing. Moving to Los Angeles in 1993, he made a commitment to his acting career and has studied with Paul Sylvan, Charlie Adler, and Jason Robards III to hone his skills and evolve into the performance artist he is today. He's also been learning guitar with David Kaufman and is working with singing coach, Vince Lonergan to add to his repertoire. Tim took creative writing in college and sharpened his wordsmith skills by working his craft. The more than two-year process of writing, illustrating and performing this original work has culminated in Tim's one-man show. Whether you read the book, hear the performance CD, or experience the comedic energy on the theater stage, Village Idiom, is expected to attract rave reviews from Beatles fans and sophisticated audiences in venues throughout the United States. When Tim is not creating or performing you can find him speed skating and working out, experimenting with photography, playing his guitar, helping people with his knowledge of alternative medicine and blissfully enjoying the
