Further tales of Brill's "Post-Country Heartache," savvy urban Pop, and melancholic Americana. The follow-up to Brill's debut, "Halve the Light." "For those wondering, 'Oh, Brother Where Art Thou?' He's right here..." Billboard Magazine 11 MP3 Songs ROCK: Americana, ROCK: Acoustic Details: Paul Brill first began making music in the great tradition of bedroom musicians, writing and recording songs on his four-track home studio. Following a period of wood-shedding in Vermont, Los Angeles and San Francisco, with extensive national DIY touring, he settled in NYC. Paul's 2001 solo debut, Halve the Light, was critically acclaimed and was a college radio darling, entering the charts as 12th-most-added and receiving strong airplay across the nation. He terms his music, "Post-Country Heartache," writing songs that fall somewhere in the intersection between Pop and Americana and weave a narrative amongst the sultry tones of pedal steel, guitars, strings, piano, and vocal harmony.
