As a band, Lost Coin has had only one goal - to strive for excellence in their music, their showmanship, and their message. "Music is the great communicator," explains lead singer Michael Bannerman. "As a band, it's important to us that our music and shows are incredibly entertaining, but it is equally important that our music has something to say. There are already more than enough bands singing songs about cotton candy and bubble gum. It's not that there isn't a place for that kind of stuff - it's just that we're not it." The songs on the band's latest project titled "Human" focus on the personal experience that people explore in their search for their place in the world. "As musicians we sing about the things that are important to us," says keyboardist Scott Bannerman. "It is about who we are and what we think and feel. People are constantly looking for some kind of meaning from their life. We believe we have found some meaning in ours and desire to share our thoughts and feelings through our music..."
