The first instrument I played was the violin, taught to me using the Suzuki method. From there I took on the clarinet, and for many years was happy, but at the end of the day, something was still missing. I loved learning about music, learning the lines and spaces of the staff, the value of the notes, how rhythm and melody coincide. But my instrument, per my insistence must be voice. I had a new burning passion and it was clear, ever present, and ever growing; my passion is voice. The first time I actually went to a formal voice class I was terrified; the mere thought of how I would acutally sound overwhelmed me. Playing an instrument is one thing, but when that instrument is your voice, well that is a different story. I was nervous, embarrassed, and downright afraid. I finally learned the basics (breathing, sight singing, etc.) but all I could concentrate on was how I sounded. On the collegiate level, the basic principles of classical voice were continually reinforced. Terms like Bel Canto as well as methods introduced by Nicola Vaccai. Composers, such as Bizet, and lyricists such as Bryce and SAGE to this day bring warmth to my soul. What is there not to love about music written for the voice? The composition, the lyric, the sheer magnificence of the fusion, the final result being the most beloved- the song. To music, noble art I bow in adoration. I look forward most to sharing my knowledge and passion through the works released by Adara Records. My commitment is to be the best musician that I can be."
