The son of Philip and Natalie Humphrey, Michael is the second of six children, with four brothers and one sister. The heritage on his fathers side is Welsh, Irish, English and American Indian while his mothers side is Russian. Michael sometimes jokingly refers to himself as World War III. The story of Michael begins with an upbringing of entertaining. His father, Phil Humphrey, was half of the legendary rockabilly group The Fendermen who yodeled himself a hit record in 1960 with a Jimmy Rodgers/George Vaughn song Mule Skinner Blues. His mother, Natalie, was a go-go dancer and still performed while pregnant with Michael. At around the age of six, Michaels parents left the entertainment business and moved to Ontario, Canada. Michael spent the next 11 years growing up in Canada and ended up living on the outskirts of Vancouver, B.C. in various other towns. Michael always loved to entertain and would often organize the other siblings and friends to do skits or plays for the family and neighbors. One of Michaels favorite things to do was perform lip-synch concerts, construct all the instruments out of Lego and use Lite-Bright as the stage lights. Michaels influences at that time were Chicago, Peter Frampton, ELO, Gary Wright and Simon and Garfunkel. Michaels fathers guitar would always be around and Michael picked it up and taught himself to play. Michael wrote his first song at the age of 12, called The Old Hut and The Blackbird. Michael loved the applause that the audience gave him and was bitten by the entertainment bug. He continued to write music and would weave acting into his life as well. Growing up with other siblings so close in age spawned the spirit of competition. In high school, Michael recalls watching his younger brother David perform in a play. Realizing he could do that as well, Michael signed up to take the acting class and quickly found himself excelling, taking starring role after starring role. Michael wound up acting in community theatre and upon his senior year, auditioned for acceptance into the American Academy of Dramatic Arts. Michael was accepted and left for his home state of California, the summer of his 18th birthday. Things did not go well upon his arrival. With no scholarship funds, no parental financial aid and student loans unavailable because he didn't reside in California the entire prior year, Michael had to leave the AADA after only a few weeks of attendance. Devastated, he soon ran out of money and found himself homeless in Los Angeles for 8 months before getting enough money to return to Canada. Over the next few years, Michael tried to find himself traveling up and down the West Coast. Michael soon found himself in the role of worker, got married and lost himself in a nine-to-five job with a beer chaser. Michael continued to dream about music and acting. In 1997, Michael found himself in Seattle for the birth of grunge. Michael was attending the Art Institute of Seattle and taking classes to learn about the Music and Video Business. It was at that time that he hosted a television show called Seattle Rocks. Michael interviewed many other celebrities from Michael Stipe of R.E.M. to Kurt Cobain of Nirvana. This confirmed that Michael wanted to be an entertainer of that caliber and he started making records. Most of his recordings were poorly produced and ended up going nowhere. After a few years of attempting to make it, Michael found himself divorced and living alone in Santa Barbara, California as a successful Realtor. After many years of not speaking to the rest of his family, Michael's father called him up. Phil was in bad shape and addicted to painkillers. Michael took an interest in re-kindling his relationship with his dad. In early 2005, Michael flew with his father, back to Green Bay to re-unite him with his band and watch him accept a mid-west RocknRoll Hall of Fame award. Seeing his father on-stage for the first time brought tears to Michael's eyes. He knew at that moment what he wanted to do or die trying. Michael spent the rest of the year performing in Monaco and other small venues around the world with just his acoustic guitar. Learning what the audience liked and didn't like, he was able to compile the material for his latest album, Revelations. He has been compared with the likes of Sting, James Taylor, John Waite and Bob Seger. Michael says, It's an honor to be compared to those guys. They have accomplished so much and are soon to be legends. Michael writes from his heart and hopes that people enjoy his stories. Michael has just finished co-producing his father's resurrection album, with new versions of his hit Mule Skinner Blues which is currently in the top 25 of the European Country Music Chart landing at Number 8 on the chart and has also produced his own album, Revelations, scheduled for release in August 2006. Not only was Michael instrumental in the mastering of both records, but he also used his business experience and marketing background to design both CD packages, the websites for his independent record label and artist roster, mailers, posters and all other administrative facets. Michael has explored radio marketing and promotion and retail distribution both in physical and digital sales. Michael is currently owner of Lit Match Records and currently resides in Santa Barbara, California.
