Every subject is fair game." The project uncovers a number of talents and collaborations. Inner Me is filled with the virtue of versatility. "Stairway to Heaven", a brilliant story of the hardships of life and the desire to escape life's trials. Howie Tee, veteran mastermind, produced Fallen Love, a beautiful love song with the retrospective appeal of a 1950's soda pop song. Troy Hightower, multi-platinum engineer, blessed the album with the production of "Father", a spiritual plea to the heavens. The talents of producer Greg "Mr. Speed" Brown are displayed throughout the Inner Me project. "Speed is one of my best friends and he knows how to bring out the best in me in the studio. We complement each other." This arena is not a new avenue for this artist. He started engaging in the industry in 1985 as a rapper. In 1990, he performed alongside Ice Cube and YoYo at the Palladium in Baltimore, MD. In 1999, his group "The What" launched his musical career into high gear. "The What" performed at the Rap Sheet Concert in Atlanta, GA on the same bill as Wu Tang Clan, Run DMC, and a number of established artists. The album was independently released and began to take off. Before receiving the critical acclaim deserved, financial setbacks occurred. Doggedly pursuing his goals and dreams, Sean adds, "I feel I have grown into a more rounded artist through the years. I see the obstacles with "The What" as a stepping-stone. It wasn't my time to shine. The time is now." Sean notes his creative influences as Sam Cooke, Michael Jackson, Stevie Wonder, and Marvin Gaye. Sean is well prepared and determined to take his rightful place among urban and pop music's finest. He is truly a man with mission. "I want to take R&B, hip-hop and even pop to another level, so I can achieve what every artist ultimately wants -- longevity." True to himself, his music, family, friends and fans, Sean is indeed capable of achieving global success and a long lasting musical legacy. Indeed the Gemini in him demands nothing less. Failure is not an option. ###
