Like most internet users, youve probably come across web pop-ups. Dont you hate them when they pop all over your computer with so many windows you can hardly shut them down? So how do these internet marketers expect to intrude my privacy like this, annoy me, then expect me to buy whatever they are selling on these pop-ups? Why is it that so many ISPs have come up with more and more aggressive methods of blocking these pains in the neck? But still you find more and more marketers are using them... Friday, December 04, 2009 Dear Internet marketer, I have seen quite a variation of these tools, and have had a share of their good and bad side. But I thought none of them offered what I wanted. You see, I put myself and my needs first as a customer or internet surfer. I then imagine all my customers would like to have what I'd like to have. It was with these unique needs in mind that I decided to create a product that would fulfil these unique internet marketers needs, at the same time not annoy their potential customers by imposing themselves to their potential customers, but rather provide more effective sales and prospect capture. ...And of course, not get blocked by pop-up blockers.
