Known for their dark, bizarre, and humorous music, theyve grown slowly into an underground sensation since their inception in 2004, often being compared favorable to The Pixies and The Flaming Lips. Their first album, Fake Words and Signs From Space, became infamous for its offbeat sarcas-hymn You Cannot Kill David Arquette. The songs subject thought highly enough of the track to thank BME with a box of cupcakes, a 1965 Ford Econoline van, and a visit to Houston while on tour promoting his film The Tripper. He was subsequently made an honorary member, is always represented at shows by a framed photograph surrounded by candles. Their second album, 2005s Last Transmission from the Blue Room, also yielded a number of tracks that managed to become well known in bizarre ways. Ology entered the kindergarten curriculum in a pre-school in Hsinchu, Taiwan, while the Western Epic, Evil Wizard Jesus almost resulted in the bands bodily removal from a festival at The University of Saint Thomas. The album marked the end of the bands original line up, as keyboardist Chris Soliz left upon its completion to pursue other projects. The next album, All You Need is Blood, was both shorter and more somber to reflect the remaining members troubled lives in 2007. Its final track, Suit of Lights became one of their most powerful pieces, and currently serves as the finale at shows, with Christmas presents being thrown to the audience during its extended guitar solo. Wishing to add to their collection of strange artist to share the stage with, a collection that includes Peelandar-Z, The Billy Nayer Show, and Psychostick, BME entered an essay contest to open for The Misfits on their 2007 30th Anniverscary Tour, beating out hundreds of applicants. Once the curtain closed, however, bassist Captain Mongo Nelson left the band to return to Minnesota. Bill Curtner, Brian Coleman, Christi Lain, and Jef With One F still reside in Houston, and are currently at work on BMEs fourth studio album.
