Reviews: An adrenaline rush of a noisercoaster, a heady combination of amusement and confusemen...and like all such rides, it is over much too quickly. Gerritt (Wittmer) is the man behind the Misanthropic Agenda (label that is), a key to his release is the amount of space and swirl he inserts between the raw explosions of sound. There's a nice sense of tension mounting, before you feel a full audio overload. And his use of effects is stellar, there's a reverb tunnel that #4 goes through which gets tighter and tighter until it squeezes out into a waterfall of noise, reducing down eventually to a rhythm of drops, or pulses real...and then in the end we get a slow fade of white noise. All of the tracks make nice use of panning, and stereo straying (check the pinballing left/right early in #5, which by the end of that piece has changed entirely into something like a game show with electrodes and jackhammers hooked up to contestants. But despite that, this is no Fear Factor of a release; the sheer noise is volcanic, but very well sculpted and honestly pretty damn fun. Two (#1, #6) of the tracks feature human whoops of sheer exhilliration. All cuts go through a variety of passages and make this an exceptional release of extreme electronics. E-ticket all the way... - Thurston Hunger
