

Surviving Valentines Day

Introduction Ten years ago if you had asked someone what Valentines meant to them they would probably tell you that it was really no big deal. It might have been important for a florist who has a promotion or a local restaurant that offers roses with its dinner but there was never a big deal about it and never too much money, time and effort that was spent on it. However, these days Valentines Day is such a big thing that you would have to be living on the moon if you didnt know anything about it. As early as December, you will be surrounded by advertisements, promotions, special offers and gift ideas in newspapers, on TV, on radio, on the Internet - basically everywhere you turn. For some people all this hype is way too much and they prefer to ignore the slightest insinuation that Valentines Day is on its way. Others will find it quite depressing that they see or hear so much about it everywhere, considering that they are actually single and find that they will have no one to celebrate it with. Contrary to popular belief though, Valentines Day is about love and not necessarily among couples only. It can also be shared amongst family, friends and anyone you would like to share love with. You can be 9 or 90 but love is something we all feel and it is definitely something we all need in both small and big ways. It keeps us happy so theres definitely no use in letting the commercial aspects of Valentines actually ruin this thought for you. A simple Im thinking of you to Mum, you mean a lot to me can make a considerable difference in any ones life, regardless of whether you are the giver or the recipient.
