House Music, he says, is not about the way things used to be, it's about what's happening today and what might be going on tomorrow. He's a true believer in house music in and of itself, not someone who sees it as just some disposable style of dance music with its better days long since gone. "For me, the reason I write music specifically, is because I love house music," he says. "Ultimately it boils down to a celebration of house music, not a celebration of disco or jazz or funk or all the things that influenced me. I'm all about celebrating what i do, because that's what I love. What I am is house, is electronica, i'm this thing - I live it." "Viaggio di Vita" proves, Marc Antonio isn't using the platform of an artist album to venture off into genre twisting dribble that is fashionable for today's dance music artists. "There's still a lot more to be said with house music," he says. "While maintaining its integrity, you can push it as much as you want, but don't move backward--as if something that brought you here is somehow more legitimate."
