A record bought in the 60s and 70s, usually meant, engrossing yourself not only in the songs, but you also had to kick back, lyrics to hand, and completely immerse yourself in every word of every song on the record. This you would do until you had become a part of that record, and every fibre of it had become a part of you. picking over nuances and meanings that then became references in your own life. mid life (and the definitive break up) is such a record. sit back, experience it, and with booklet to hand, take it in, take it on! let it happen! separately; there has been an article written by the british media, featuring: an appraisal of why (white stripes) became so popular and it goes on about how their music is rooted in the past but that they give it a contemporary and relevant twist. and that they are embracing the past and its emphasis on strong songwriting. rosemary rebecca swan: credits include: top of the pops bbc1 / brit awards earls court stadium.
