Dark-Laced Indie Pop with Primal Electronic Production and Soaring Harmonies, guaranteed to make you uncomfortable on every spin. 13 MP3 Songs POP: Piano, ROCK: Modern Rock Details: An introspective look at the internal and external struggles of life of the 20s, the music on Finally The View Has Changed was inspired by experimental singer/songwriters the world over, as well as by environment and modern culture. The piano-driven album touches on issues from both sides of the equation, such as everyday angst like jealousy (Too Far) and loneliness (I Have No Right), as well as growing jaded (Be That Man) and shedding long-held demons (What I Didn't Know). Musically, the album focuses on piano based melodies, with tracks like Wonderful Magic and To Paul solely piano/vocal pieces. Midway through, the focus shifts to away from piano and explores the outskirts of pop and electronic music, with the Chromaharp strums and industrial-light beats of I Have No Right, and the electronic, almost Bjork-like subtlety of Burden, a song addressing the fears that comes before many gay men and women come out of the proverbial closet. The abrasive new-wave bounce of Be That Man opens the album with a bang, while by the time you get to the soft, melancholy of The View you don't know which way to turn. Patrick's jagged vocals howl at one point and are at a near whisper at others, but the harmonies and multi-lyrical layered vocals should pleasantly bring the listener down from the intense cloud by song's end. The live drums on the Americana Sorry For What I've Done and the Electroni-Folk Boys Like Me also add to the surprise element and result in loosening out the airtight electric pulses resonating throughout the rest of the lp. Artist Info: Patrick Boothe is a Dallas/Fort-Worth, Texas native and is still based in the area, where he is currently playing around various clubs and looking for new musical ventures along the way. In 2003, Patrick formed his Abusing Music imprint and released his debut album, the more industrial and angry "Dub Escape".
