Details: It would be a cliché to say that Jennings Dulin was playing country before country was cool. It's just that country music just happened to become what JD already was. Jennings has been carving a niche for himself since the early 80s, from Music Row in Nashville to the pig-roast circuit in the Shenandoah Valley. His songs Madison Moonshine and Wood Trolls had been in rotation on WSLA in Louisa, Virginia and captured the imagination of the station's audience, which ran up and down Virginia's Shenandoah Valley. JD found himself in demand on an endless circuit of pig roasts, barbecues and mountain parties as well as club dates and opening slots for artists such as Travis Tritt. A powerful guitarist with a rich, whiskey-tinged, barroom baritone, JD has forged a writing style that captures the true character and spirit of country. He can spin out a tear in my beer ballad with the best of them but it's his songs that speak of real life in rural America that sets his music apart from the more formulaic country writers of today. Madison Moonshine and Wood Trolls have received numerous awards in national songwriting competitions and have been pitched to national country artists by Sony /Tree publishing in Nashville. With the current popularity of country music, JD is finding a wider audience for his music. His In The City received a certificate of achievement from Billboard Magazine and demonstrates his shift to more universal themes from his country roots. His crossover ballad Ash, Dust and Dirt won second place in the Folk division and Honorable mention in the Country division in the Mid Atlantic Song Contest and was included on their annual winners compilation CD. JD has been hailed by Country Plus Magazine for his great songs, great singing and great guitar playing. It's all true. His recordings bear it out. His live shows bear it out. His writing bears it out. And with todays country music being absorbed into pop, folk and rock, more and more audiences are finding in Jennings Dulin the things that are good about country music.
