I have often been asked "why music and accounting?," and my response has been music is my obsession and accounting will be my profession. However, in recent months I have come to ask myself why shouldn't my obsession be my profession? The start of college sparked the start of my individual music. I have been a classically trained pianist for 17 years, but have looked for new musical challenges. College is a time when you start to define who you are, which, for me, also meant define what my music is. Throughout college I continued to perform classical music, but I also wanted to create something that was only mine rather than an interpretation of other artist's work. And now for the past five years, along with defining myself, I've been defining my music. I have written a diverse set of songs that have been generated by emotions I've experienced, interactions with people in my life, reoccurring themes in my life, and some conclusions I've come too. Some of the most rewarding experiences have been after performing and hearing the audience's reactions, but the most rewarding experience I had occurred this summer when I created Scrambled Reflections. Scrambled Reflections is a collection of songs that I have written over the years. Most of the songs reflect back on my past experiences and describe them in a distorted way. It is a relaxing cd that is meant to make listeners think and perhaps reflect back on their own life. Tags: pop
