There is a fine line between telling the truth and not appearing to use a hardship to gain sympathy or support. I have seen so many situations where people use their misfortune to obtain what they do not deserve. I do not want to be one of those individuals. Before I expose my truth I only ask that you judge the music based on what you hear and feel. Do not let my circumstances interfere with you expressing your opinion, good or bad. Since I can remember I have always been singing. Throughout the years I missed many opportunities because I did not know, or understand, what commitment and dedication was. Then about three years ago I was told I had cancer. Not the kind of cancer they can currently remove or cure. But a cancer that has spread through out my body. It is currently being controlled, but its not a matter of if, but when. At first there was not a day that went by that I did not ask myself, why me, while at the same time feeling sorry for myself. Then I realized the only thing I was doing was wasting the time and life I had left. I may not know how much time I have left. But I will not spend it in self pity or tears. Last year someone I know that is associated with the music business stopped by unannounced to say hi. He was unaware of my circumstances at the time. After explaining my condition I asked if he would help me record one song so my family would have something besides cover material to remember me by. I wanted what I left behind to be my song. Without hesitation he agreed and soon thereafter we began working on a song. Before I knew what happened it was nine months later and here we are now on the verge of releasing an entire CD. There is so much more to this story that time does not allow me to explain. But I am proud of what I have done in the past nine months. While at the same time I am sad that this is what it took for me to accomplish what I should have done before. Whether you love, like, do not care for my songs. At least I will know someone listened to what I have to offer. Either way I will live the rest of my life knowing that I did something I will always be proud of. Dawn
