Though her sound is unique, she has been compared to Tori Amos, Sarah Brightman, and Enya. Growing up in a family of musicians, including her regionally well-known parents, Dennis and Mary Ellen Monroe, music became Mary Shannon's life passion. At the young age of 14 she made her debut performing and co-writing music with her family group, "The Monroes", for the radio series "Come out into the Garden". It aired on WXXI. Since then Mary, now 29, has been captivating audiences with her original music, and arrangements of many others, throughout New York State. Mary was only 15 when she composed her first song, and many more have followed. On her new album "It's All Okay Now", a collection of Mary Shannon's original music from 1996 - 2006, she performed, wrote, arranged and produced all the tracks except one vocal, and one bass track. The instruments she played on the album are, violin, harp, guitar, tenor recorder, bass, keyboard, percussion, and the lead and backup vocals. The gift to pick up and play almost any instrument resembles her late father Dennis Monroe's abilities. Several songs were written for him after he passed away on February 4, 2006. The album is dedicated to him. Mary started writing the title song "It's All Okay Now" for her friend Lori Brizee, that passed away in 2005. A few months before her father passed away he had a chance to listen to the first verse and chorus of "It's All Okay Now", and told Mary how he loved the song, and that she wrote beautiful music. In February 2006, after her father's passing, she finished writing the song for him. "I'm so thankful God gave me the gift of music, it has gotten me through many hard times. It is a blessing to be able to wake up every day looking forward to my work. I hope everyone uses their talents they are given to there full ability. That is the only way we will be truly happy. It's never to late to start, today is a Brand New Day." - Mary Shannon
