The Internet is full of content. Some content is great and some of it is just good. Some content is mediocre and some is plainly bad very, very bad. Web content provides information for those in need of it, entertainment for those want it, inspiration for those searching for it and education for those who desire it. Surfing the Web suggests that an internet user steps rather blindly onto the information super highway with hopes that they'll end up somewhere interesting. We've all been there and done that in our explorations of the web surfed from one link to the next in search of distraction. But more often an internet user is on a search for something they want, need or deeply crave. There is a chasm between those who add valuable content to the web and those who use keyword stuffed content only to suck in as many visitors as possible. Marketers on both sides of this wide canyon would like to profit from their content, but they have different strategies and goals for their efforts. Marketers that want to build an internet business that is both profitable and adds value to the web as a whole will find
