Winter Machine plays acoustic-based music with folk, punk, pop, alt-country, and hip-hop influences. 13 MP3 Songs POP: Folkly Pop, FOLK: Power-folk Details: Winter Machine is the natural evolution of a musical friendship between Minneapolis-based indie-folk artists Coleman Lindberg and Henry Bishop. The pair met in 1998 and immediately felt a creative synergy, often opening for each other at various Twin Cities clubs, coffee shops, and community events. In 2001, they joined forces with drummer Chris Hepola and bassist Eric Struve to form a full band and record the CD "A Few Things I Believe," which blended a raw live folk sound with quirky pop and new-wave production flourishes. The band went on indefinite hiatus in early 2003 so its individual members could pursue solo projects, but demand for recordings of Bishop and Lindberg remains consistent and the pair is still known to surprise audiences with impromptu on-stage collaborations. Bishop is currently involved with an emo/indie outfit called Running on Empty, while Lindberg is performing solo and recording new material for an upcoming solo release. Here's what one publication had to say about this CD: "Winter Machine falls somewhere between a youth-oriented Timbuk 3 and a superfortified Ani DiFranco...with slick production values and transcribed lyrics, ["A Few Things I Believe"] offers much to the groupie who wants a personal, portable validation of his, her, or zir queerness." ---Lavender Magazing, Sept. 2002
