Details: I had a record deal not long ago and they wrote this fancy bio, where it sounded like I was king of the world, destined for greatness, and somehow different from all the rest. I'm not. The truth is, my story isnt any different from your story. The names might not be the same, the events probably took place on off days, and the exact times dont quite line up. You call your experience one thing, I call it another. But at the end of the day, just after you close your eyes but before you fall asleep, Im pretty sure your world takes on the same color as mine. Your struggles and triumphs are unique because they come from your voice. But the stories belong to all of us, all part of the same conversation, just with different names. I write songs about that conversation. But what Im really trying to do is find a connection to you to build a bridge across this great divide of everyday living and somehow draw a line between us. Sometimes its like that theres this clothesline strung between two buildings somewhere in south Chicago, with shirts and pants and socks waving in the wind that weaves its way off the lake and through the maze of concrete and steel. And at one end of the line is a window, and behind that glass theres a world of holidays, proms, and first loves going on. At the other end of the line is another window, with its own world of broken hearts, missed opportunities, and loss going on, behind a different piece of glass. And in between those two windows theres this line, which those worlds share everyday, where whats most personal to them is hung out to dry. I guess I write about the line. I live with my dog Stella in a small beach town north of San Diego. I surf and write and play music here, when Im not out there somewhere doing the same. And were not that different.
