Like most internet users, you've probably come across web "pop-ups". Don't you hate them when they pop all over your computer with so many windows you can hardly shut them down? So how do these internet marketers expect to intrude my privacy like this, annoy me, then expect me to buy whatever they are selling on these "pop-ups"? Why is it that so many ISPs have come up with more and more aggressive methods of blocking these "pains in the neck"? But still you find more and more marketers are using them... The reason is that "pop-ups" CAN be very effective and very profitable tools if used properly. It was with these unique needs in mind that I decided to create a product that would fulfil these unique internet marketers' needs, at the same time not annoy their potential customers by imposing themselves to their potential customers, but rather provide more effective sales and prospect capture. ...And of course, not get blocked by "pop-up blockers".
