"Below Sunset," the band's new album, features thirteen tracks, including the first single and video, "They Don't Care," and a dramatic reading of Eurythmics' classic, "Here Comes The Rain Again." # # # MUSIC CONNECTION's review of Hypnogaja's live show: Hypnogaja's soulful, melodic hooks interplay equally with modern balls-to-the-wall urban-thrash. The songs are extremely dramatic, with the total effect being a wall of sound that is familiar, yet striking. There are hints of Staind and Faith No More, as well as nu-metal and urban affectations, such as sampling, that smack of a kinder, gentler Slipknot. This group covers a broad musical soundscape, yet they manage to stand out within it." ShyBoy's moniker is obvious irony. He is a very talented and versatile vocalist with impressive charisma. Nubar's haunting chords on keys create a texture that the rest of the band can follow. The most remarkable quality, however, is that each member functions so well within this group's framework that the result is a rock solid unit." The very first chord was an assault -- and it was contagious. For the duration of the set, Hypnogaja became an army of musical voices with a sonic force that threatened to break down genre walls. The band's dynamic stage presence held the crowd in place and moved them at will. When Hypnogaja finally released the reins at the end of their set, the audience was left breathless. -Lauri Shaw
