With his father being a nightclub DJ, he took to music at a very young age. However, Brandon wanted to entertain, seemingly willing to perform for anyone. Whether it was singing or dancing, he wanted to be in the spotlight. At age 11, he began "voicing over" hip-hop songs until it seemed effortless. About a year later, he advanced to writing his own lyrics. He used his lyrics with many different beats until he had created his own style. By age 13, he began rapping with his friends, mostly freestyling for fun. With suggestions from his father, his lyrics had become more sophisticated, now involving stories instead of just rhymes. His effort to record songs using only a desktop computer convinced his parents to build a music studio in his room so he would have full access to the necessary equipment. With a music studio on hand full time, B.Ware went to work writing lyrics. One thing he didn't have was his own music. So his father, Capital P, began developing beats for him. As beats were being created, Brandon wrote lyrics for each beat. The finishing touches to most songs were enhanced with non-exclusive beats mixed with the beats that were created by Capital P. In 2005, B.Ware created his own mix CD. Mostly, it was freestyling. In hindsight, he realized that he needed assistance producing a CD. Again, Capital P was there to help. The challenge for B.Ware from his father was, "See if you can create a hip-hop CD without profanity that's entertaining". The goal was realized when they worked together to produce the 16 track CD, "Beware of B.Ware".
